

ABSTRACT

In previously known electrodeposition methods, alloys can be deposited only badly on a substrate from the components thereof. The inventive method allows an alloy layer to be deposited on a substrate by pulsing the current/voltage used for electrode position.